Train employees to protect your company's data

123456. Year after year, this has been at the top of the most commonly used passwords charts. As the person responsible for IT compliance in your organization, sirens should be going off. Although creating safe passwords reflects just a part of IT training, it demonstrates the gap in knowledge for many employees in your company. Not only does this present a risk for your company's data, but it also jeopardizes your customers' confidential and sensitive information.

In today's digital world, your organization relies more and more on virtual and cloud-based systems, meaning that employees will need to have a better understanding of topics such as cybersecurity, GDPR, HIPAA, anti-phishing, and malware.
